

ABSTRACT

The present invention enables self-employed people to work like hired employees in a united company, while still keeping a high level of autonomy without dependency or loss of control, and preferably enjoying also various additional benefits, such as for example getting additional advantages from an organization that joins together self-employed people. This is preferably done by creating a cell structure in the united company so that although each self-employed person is defined in terms of tax status as an employee, he has preferably much more autonomy and is preferably protected from various actions and/or problems of the company and/or of other employees, and preferably the company and other employees are similarly protected from various actions of the self-employed person.
